Shorthand has been a cultural tool for centuries. As a matter of fact, George Bernard Shaw wrote his plays in shorthand, Martin Luther's sermons and Shakespeare's plays were all preserved by using shorthand. Before becoming a famous author, Charles Dickens learnt stenography and earned his living for some time as a newspaper reporter. Known also as phonography, tachygraphy and brachygraphy, shorthand is an art of recording the sounds using symbols. A magic of transforming spoken words into beautiful written material, the modern system of shorthand, as it is known today, was developed by Sir Issac Pitman in 1837. But these days, every steno is a 'Pitman'

(or Pitwoman) because, he/she makes up his/her own symbols and outlines. Therefore, one steno cannot transcribe another's noting. The reason is, each steno has his or her own characteristic way of writing outlines and joining/disjoining those, which he or she alone can decipher. What's more, he/she may not be able to transcribe it himself/herself, the next day! Here, stenography resembles steganography, meaning the art and science of writing hidden messages in such a way that no one understands (including the writer, in this case!).

- (i) How does the author describe shorthand? Who developed it?
- (ii) How did Dickens earn his livelihood before he became a famous author?

(iii) What is steganography?

(iv) Why can one steno not transcribe another's noting?

(v) Why does the author claim that every steno today is a Pitman or Pitwoman?
